- This creates runs the Naive Bayes' model and creates a confusion matrix of results. This model has an accuracy score of 27.96%. Authors such as Peter Humphrey and Roger Fillion were predicted fairly accurately while the model failed to predict Schuettler, Macartney,Dicke,Eelyn and Kazer.

Random Forest

- This method makes sense since it allows for many simulations of different combinations of words to try to predict the author.

```
set.seed(1)
DTM_test = as.matrix(DTM_test)
DTM_train = as.matrix(DTM_train)

xx <- data.frame(DTM_test[,intersect(colnames(DTM_test), colnames(DTM_train))])
yy <- read.table(textConnection(""), col.names = colnames(DTM_train), colClasses = "integer")
```

- This makes sure that both the test set has all of the same words as the training set.

- I ran a randomForest model of four words on 350 trees. The model had an accuracy score of 74%, which is much better than Naive Bayes. 12 authors had a sensitivity score of .9 or better which is much better than Naive Bayes.

- A support of .01 works here since there are so many possible items for a cart, if a set of items appear in 1% of the carts it's a pretty high number. Confidence of .4 gives a larger list than a higher confidence number, but I will subset a bit to try to see if I can get rules with higher confidence.

inspect(subset(Carts, subset=confidence >.5 & lift > 2.5))
```

```
lhs                rhs                support confidence    lift

3 {rolls/buns,       => {other vegetables} 0.01220132  0.5020921 2.594890
root vegetables}
```

- If a cart contains root vegetables and fruit, it'll contain some more vegetables. This makes sense to me as those who buy fruits and vegetables should be more likely to buy more fruits and vegetables. What's interesting is when we add rolls/buns with root vegetables buys other vegetables. But that could be for sandwiches or burgers and the vegetables could be placed on top.

```
inspect(subset(Carts, subset=confidence > 0.5 & support > .015))
```

```

- If a cart contains tropical fruit/vegetables and yogurt it will contain whole milk. This makes sense as carts containing a dairy product should intuitively contain more dairy products.
